In the space below, you can see a full-screen view of a photo of my niece and nephews being silly in front of our camera. Above the photo, I've uploaded a Photoshop Elements template that was automatically generated by Elements. This is a full-screen view. As you can see, the Elements template I have uploaded gives the photos a few standard editing effects. The photo has a slight green color cast, some lens and lighting related artifacts and a blur effect over the sky. In this case, I used a preset "B&W" and " a681f4349e

Q: Groovy/Ant: Is there a way to list embedded code files into a jar file? In my web application, there is a dependency (third party) code that is used in various source files. The code is given in an embeded code-laying file (like css, js, etc.) and may be used directly in source files. Say this is my source file code: `$(content.css) $(content.js) $(content.js.tpl) $(content.png)` All the dependencies inside the code are embedded in this file. I want to create a JAR file with the source files and the embedded code, so that the user can have that code for the source files, plus I want to have the actual dependency jar file with it's own compiled classes (so that the code inside the embedded code is in the same class file). My question is: is there a tool that allows me to convert a single source files containing embedded code to a jar file with the code embedded and the original source file as well? So far, I found these, but they don't seem to help in my case (or maybe I didn't get it): A: There is at least one tool that can do this in a (marginally) automated way, the next version of Maven can do this by default if you create a jar archive of all your source files, and then turn on the "embedded-resources" goal. The relevant part of the Apache Maven documentation is here: Note that it only handles java source files, and that the embedded resources will not be extracted out of the jar file. `{ "images": { { "idiom": "iphone", "scale": "1x" }, {`

Electrical impedance measurements of aortic tissue: a new method of evaluating its inflammatory potential. Electrical impedance measurements of aortic tissue could be used to noninvasively monitor the course of inflammatory diseases of the aorta. To assess the utility of this approach, canine periaortic fat pads were injected with different concentrations of Escherichia coli lipopolysaccharide (LPS) and hyaluronidase. The inflammatory potential of these tissues was evaluated with a specially designed impedance apparatus, which measured the electrical impedances of the tissues along with their temperature. Electrical impedance measurements were performed in the absence and presence of lipase and hyaluronidase, which degrade the extracellular matrix and increase the permeability of the aortic wall to bacteria. In the absence of enzyme, the electrical impedance properties of the tissues were statistically similar to those of the aorta. Upon injection with LPS, the tissues demonstrated an increase in electrical impedance and a reduction in resistance, which was associated with a decrease in temperature. The electrical impedance increased linearly with the concentration of LPS injected, and the impedance data were highly reproducible. These data are consistent with a model for the electrical impedance of inflamed tissues that assumes the presence of an inflammatory substance such as albumin in the extracellular space. Hyaluronidase produced a similar increase in impedance and temperature in the tissues, and the LPS data indicated that the hyaluronidase concentration was optimal for producing a significant response. Subsequently, lysed aortas were used as controls. A similar increase in impedance was observed in the presence of hyaluronidase and normal saline; however, hyaluronidase in normal saline produced a significantly greater response than saline alone. The changes in the tissue were not associated with changes in length, indicating that these data are not a result of changes in swelling. This study suggests that electrical impedance measurements can be used as a noninvasive method for monitoring the course of inflammatory diseases of the aorta.Q: using struct with standard STL containers I want to know if the standard containers can deal with different types of memory buffers. More specifically, I want to use a fixed size buffer to store values into a container. I also want to know if these variables get initialized to 0 (zero) or anything else. For example: `std::list list; std::vector vector; std::stringstream`
