To determine the association between maternal allergy and intrapartum preterm labor. We performed a single-center retrospective case-control study using chart reviews and allergy testing. Patients with preterm labor (PTL) were compared with control patients who underwent delivery for nonallergic pregnancy-induced hypertension and preterm labor (n = 129), intrapartum bleeding (n = 33), placental complications (n = 29), or unspecified diagnoses. Three allergists evaluated maternal allergy status, including allergic rhinitis, food allergies, and asthma. The prevalence of allergic rhinitis was higher in PTL patients (44.5%) compared with control patients (32.1%; p =.03). Maternal allergy was not associated with PTL. Multivariate logistic regression showed that maternal allergic rhinitis was a risk factor for PTL (adjusted odds ratio [OR]: 1.64; 95% confidence interval [CI]: 1.07-2.51; p =.03), but not intrapartum preterm labor. Patients with allergic rhinitis were more likely to have PTL and more likely to have an intact amniotic membrane (p =.01) at delivery than patients without allergic rhinitis. Maternal allergy is not associated with PTL, but is a risk factor for PTL.Global environments in permanent magnet machines of construction equipment and electric car are significant improvements in the power and output of permanent magnet electric motors. In the permanent magnet electric motors used in permanent magnet machines, the magnetic flux produced by magnetic field is limited in the axial direction of a rotor core. Therefore, even if many magnetic fluxes are produced by the magnets embedded in the rotor core, there is a problem that the output is limited. In a conventional, annular rotor core, because the effect of magnetic flux is reduced in the axial direction, the magnetic flux of 595f342e71
