Two men were arrested after a noise complaint at the Lee Day party in New Hyde Park early Saturday morning, authorities said. A source told the New York Post that the party was "out of control," resulting in a scene that would make any partygoer question their taste in music. Officers from the NYPD's 60th Precinct were called to the party on West 220th Street at 12:18 a.m. Saturday. The source added that half of the guests were intoxicated and that two men were taken to the hospital. A Brooklyn College student at the party claimed that the partygoers were "all drinking in the street." She added, "Someone told someone who told someone that people are suffering drug overdoses." The students also said that bouncers started throwing guests out of the building when more than 20 people refused to leave. Police then entered the building, which the source said contained the main stage and VIP lounge, and were told by a security guard that people had been thrown from the building. When officers attempted to enter the building and asked the security guard where the second floor was, the guard answered that they did not have a second floor. When officers asked the security guard how many floors were in the building, the guard responded that it was one floor. At this point, the source said, the bouncers opened the doors to allow the officers to enter. The source then claims that "[t]he party was so loud, you could barely hear what the other party was saying. One bouncer was yelling at people in the street, trying to shut the party down." When police entered the building, the source said, "they found the DJ playing music at ear level, and people at a table drinking, having a picnic," but the venue itself was closed. The officers then decided that it would be easier to take the partygoers into custody, and as a result, the party was shut down. In response, the source said that the officers "filled the rooms with cops and they just kept getting more and more intoxicated. They were throwing money on the floor, drinking, and they were stacking." The source said that at one point, officers began trying to get into other rooms on the second floor. Eventually, "someone yelled to the cops, 'You can't be coming in here, the noise is so loud!'" More than 10 people were arrested for disorderly conduct, the source added. The New York Post

Q: Problems using volatile in an HttpClient on a single threaded event handler I am using a HttpClient to execute some sql queries, and to do that I need to make sure the HttpClient is not being used by any other thread. For that, I am using the following pattern: event handler that is scheduled by a thread-pool event using await Task.Run(): public async Task PostAsync(HttpContent content, HttpActionContext context, Func postCallback) { await postCallback(); if (context.Request.Content.Headers.ContentType.MediaType == "application/json") { var obj = await Task.Run(() => LoadJSONObject()); context.Request.Content = new FormUrlEncodedContent(new[] { new KeyValuePair("id", obj.ID) }); } await context.Response.WriteAsync(context.Request.Content.ReadAsStringAsync()); } But the problem is when I try to use a "volatile" variable to detect it is going to be used by another thread, the debugger gets stuck when I use the HttpClient to call PostAsync(). Is there a way to use a volatile variable in a single-threaded event handler? A: It seems like an interesting problem. Let's think about it. In a scenario where you need a shared state across multiple threads, there are a few options. Volatile is the go-to solution for most programming scenarios. It would seem like volatile would be the best fit for this scenario. There's only one important aspect to be aware of, volatile works differently than other types of variables that can lock and synchronize across threads, such as Object.SyncRoot. This is because volatile changes all the times it's read, even if the variable is read in a thread-safe way. This makes it very problematic for situations like yours where you can't prevent a thread-safe
